TRANSFORMATIONS OF THE INTERCULTURAL EDUCATION – PEDAGOGICAL EXPLORATIONS ON THE BORDERLANDS

„A new educational perspective and a chance to change traditional approaches to education in multicultural conditions is provided by intercultural education. Its message is openness to contacts with people from other national, ethnic, religious and cultural groups. It is important to get to know the Others and their cultures, common cultural and educational activities, mutual enrichment of cultures by accepting and offering what is most valuable in given cultures, breaking stereotypes, shaping the sense of human communities, and integration”¹.

Tadeusz Lewowicki

„[...] there is a need for intercultural education with a clear axiological offer, teaching how to interact with other people, how to resolve conflicts, how to negotiate, dialogue and coexist”².

Alina Szczurek-Boruta

„[...] the problems of crossing borders and creating "borderlands" seem to be relevant in the context of education aimed at the formation of intercultural competence. [...] each borderland is characterized by specificity and can be an area of cultural integration and disintegration. On the one hand it abolishes cultural, ethnic and religious divisions, on the other it can become a space of cultural separation and stigmatization”³.

Jerzy Nikitorowicz

„Although Polish intercultural studies have been developing only since the 1990s, they refer to a rich tradition and a well-developed network of notions concerning Polish education [...]. Since then, they have also disseminated the research results of their studies in Poland and worldwide, contributing to the interdisciplinary view on this scientific discipline”⁴.

ABSTRACT

The article points out relations between sources and transformations of Polish intercultural pedagogy and variously understood borderland contexts, because - paradoxically - borderlands are situated in the centre of pedagogical interests. Borderlands are situated in many ways in the centre of Polish intercultural pedagogy, and their recognition and research contributes to the transformation of intercultural pedagogy. Attention was paid to outlining currents of research on borderlands and intercultural relations, the research which is conducted by pedagogues (in an interdisciplinary setting) in university centres located in borderlands. In particular, the theoretical concepts of borderland, which are close to Bakhtin's (dialogic and open) interpretation of this cultural and educational phenomenon, were examined. Interdisciplinary references of pedagogical borderland research to the research in other scientific disciplines were shown. The transformative character of intercultural communication and its transgressive aspects are highlighted. Various difficulties and threats, which are related to the intensification of multiculturalism and identity change processes, were also taken into consideration. In the conclusion it is proposed, among other things, to edit an anthology of articles giving evidence about the course and effects of pedagogical recognition of borderland, which takes place in interdisciplinary dialogue, so that intercultural pedagogy becomes theoretically more mature and self-conscious of its scientific identity, and intercultural education is an effective and at the same time reflective pedagogical activity.

INTRODUCTION

Associating the range of research issues and practical functions attributed to intercultural pedagogy with the category of transformation imposes itself, as it were, because of the theoretical and practical interests of intercultural pedagogy. This is reflected in the scientific literature on this topic. There was an international conference under the title, in which the concept of intercultural education and social transformation were directly juxtaposed, considering such a juxtaposition as accurate and well reflecting the sense and goals of this education oriented to intercultural relations: „Intercultural Education as a Project for Social Transformation. Linking theory and practice towards Equity and Social Justice” (Malta, 16 -

18 september, 2010). In the foreword to the post-conference volume, the coordinator and editor of the volume, Patricia Mata states:

„This Conference aims to deeply explore Intercultural Education theory and practice within the context of societal transformation, equity and social justice. The term “Intercultural Education” has frequently appeared in academic papers on education and contemporary society. Educational policies and regulations, and the communications media have also started to this type of terminology. Its rapid spread and use, however, have had one negative effect, confusion: it seems to be treated as a magic word, the very use of which has the effect of invoking modernity. However, what is being discussed are other kinds of measures and concepts which have also been known by other names such as: compensatory education, special programs, education for indigenous peoples, education for immigrants, and events to celebrate cultural differences, just to name a few”⁶.

Attention is drawn to the clearly recorded inflation (it was the year 2010) of the understanding of intercultural education, which is referred to quite freely, without the necessary precision, in various contexts: „Its rapid spread and use, however, have had one negative effect, confusion: it seems to be treated as a magic word [...].” Patricia Mata makes a pertinent statement that is still relevant today and represents an important (even urgent) challenge for current pedagogical reflection on the theory of intercultural education in the context of social transformation. In this international reflection and debate on the proper sense of intercultural education, intercultural pedagogy developed in Poland can and should play an important role. It is inscribed in many different processes of transformation (after 1989) and it draws attention also to the need of transforming intercultural education in order to make it relevant to the challenges of social and educational transformations. What is more, intercultural pedagogy developed in Poland is connected with theoretical search and empirical research conducted in borderlands⁷, which have their own dynamics and are also spaces conducive to transformative processes occurring in many dimensions.

See: N. Ratzmann, Intercultural Dialogue. A review of conceptual and empirical issues relating to social transformation, (MOST Discussion Papers / 01), UNESCO 2019.

⁷ It is worth remembering, however, the reservation and warning that the inflation of meanings has also affected the category of borderland (such a remark is made, among others, by Agnieszka Pasieka): „The notion of ‘borderland’ has become one of those terms which, when used or rather abused in the most diverse contexts, lose their analytical value and often seem devoid of meaningless” – A. Pasieka, Jak uratować pogranicze? O teoretycznych modach i metodologicznych pulapkach [How to save borderland? On theoretical fashions and methodological traps], „WIELOGŁOS. Pismo Wydziału Polonistyki UJ” 2 (28) 2016, p. 126. „In the literature, we also find many references to the categories of social distance and borderland, interpreted as socio-cultural phenomena and spaces of symbolic culture. Borderlands are places where various groups of people meet, characterized by different cultural traditions, diverse value systems, different languages or dialects. The essence of the places where cultures meet consists therefore in the contact, meetings, dialogue, and mutual penetration of different cultures in the immediate vicinity. This area is felt as ‘being in suspension’, ‘stretched between’ physical

PEDAGOGICAL EXPLORATIONS ON THE BORDERLANDS

Borderlands - any number of ways - have become one of the main sources of inspiration for Polish pedagogical search undertaken in the face of the need to face educational challenges and dilemmas of multiculturalism. Pedagogical search in the borderlands contributed to the emergence of intercultural education on the ground of Polish pedagogical thought and to its transformation.

Theoretically interpreted and defined category of borderland and historical and current - concerning various aspects of community and individual life - borderland experience is in Polish pedagogic thought one of the basic theoretical and axiological contexts for conception and research in the field of shaping intercultural relations. Consideration and development of idealizing concepts of borderland is complemented with the study of the experience of a given borderland by the people living there, creating a heuristically fertile situation for the development of intercultural pedagogy.

Undertaking collective, systematic and interdisciplinary pedagogical research on the problem of shaping intercultural relations theoretically oriented on the category of borderland after 1989 has developed especially in the current - of different types, historically and culturally formed - Polish borderlands. This phenomenon - deserving proper emphasis - of intensive and scientifically fruitful (cognitively valuable) development of intercultural education on borderlands is aptly pointed out by Ewa Ogrodzka-Mazur, currently one of the main Polish researchers (and leaders) in the field of intercultural pedagogy:

„The theoretical studies and practical research into culturally diversified environments have been initiated and continued by three leading schools of scientific thought, conducting the studies in the Polish-Lithuanian-Belarusian-Ukrainian borderland (Jerzy Nikitorowicz's team from the University of Białystok), the Polish-Czech borderland in Cieszyn Silesia (Tadeusz Lewowicki's team from the University of Silesia) and the Polish-German-Czech-Slovak borderland (Zenon Jasiński's team from the University of Opole). Intercultural studies are also conducted by university units (departments, chairs and teams) in Bydgoszcz, Gdańsk, Kraków, Lublin, Poznań, Toruń, Warsaw and Zielona Góra”⁸.

The knowledge on the subject matter and enormous amount of bibliography related to the above concept is impressive, therefore the authors have decided to outline only the essential information required for further subject analysis. The above research subject is still being developed in Poland. These are scientific centres which carry out studies in the Polish-Belarusian-Lithuanian borderland (Jerzy

University centers located in the Polish borderlands brought - as a dowry - many years of experience (heritage) of multiculturalism and intercultural relations, which are shared by both these centers and borderland regions.

Considering what tasks should be fulfilled by the university center in Cieszyn located on the borderland, one of its ideological co-founders, Jan Szczepański, paid attention to the intellectual inspiration and research obligations resulting from the location on the borderland, thus anticipating, in a way, the establishment of a scientific school in Cieszyn for borderland studies and intercultural education:

"[...] from the point of view of growing European cooperation, when after opening the borders the University of Cieszyn will have a chance to become a local multinational university. Then its infrastructure, staff, achievements testifying to the level of teaching, the level of its impact on the population of Cieszyn will count. I think that this is an important side of the function of the Cieszyn Branch. Colleges in our times take over as if the tasks of old castles and border castles, enabling trade, safe travels, meetings and mutual influences of the nations, however they will serve more for creation of supranational communities. Because of its history, Cieszyn is particularly suited to take on such tasks"⁹.

Coming from Cieszyn Silesia and having personal experience in this respect, J. Szczepański emphasizes the duality of the borderland situation and the cultural identities shaping there:

"Cieszyn Silesia, like all border communities, produces, on the one hand, an acute sense of ethnic identity resulting from differences emphasized by 'their own', but also a greater understanding of 'strangers', encountered directly or indirectly in everyday contacts"¹⁰.

Nikitorowicz's team), the Polish-Czech borderland in Cieszyn Silesia (Tadeusz Lewowicki's team) and the Polish-German-Czech-Slovak borderland (Zenon Jasiński's team). The results of their scientific and research activity have been presented in 20 publications prepared by the Chair of Intercultural Education at the Faculty of Pedagogy and Psychology of the University of Białystok, in 68 volumes of the series "Edukacja Międzykulturowa (Intercultural Education)" published by the Social Team for Research into Borderland Education and Culture and the Department and Chair of General Pedagogy at the Faculty of Ethnology and Education of the University of Silesia and in 18 works published by the Institute of Pedagogical Sciences at the Historical- Pedagogical Faculty of the University of Opole" (Ibid, p.4).

This is also a real chance for self-development, self-perfection and enriching one's own identity. It seems that the Cieszyn Silesia community is aware that its future less and less depends on the state and national bonds and that, with growing intensity, it relates to and depends on the undertakings within the local/regional community on one hand, and on the other, on participation in the European community and in the increasing globalization” – A. This kind of existential and spiritual experience of the borderland, taking place in the cultural space of the borderland showing a "long life" (longevity) and multidimensionality (different memories of what was and the diversity of traditions passed on as heritage), definitely favors the undertaking of an intellectually disciplined, reliable - both retrospective and prospective - pedagogical reflection on such ways of experiencing the borderland and forming the identity of the borderland in the processes of intercultural communication in the borderland. In the university center in Cieszyn, these issues were taken up by the scientific school of borderland studies and intercultural education¹¹.

IN SEARCH OF THEORETICAL INSPIRATIONS FOR RECOGNIZING AND STUDYING BORDERLANDS - INTERDISCIPLINARY PERSPECTIVES

Interesting and worth quoting from the point of view of the analysis of transformation processes related to intercultural education and pedagogical search in the borderlands is a concise yet informative methodological note in which Radosław Zenderowski (also a borderland researcher) justifies the necessity of studying (neglected) borderlands on the grounds of political science:

„I believe that political scientists, but also specialists in international relations or geopolitics, focus in a "natural" way on the concept of borders, almost completely neglecting the issue of borderlands in their analyses. Many political scientists believe that it should be analyzed by sociology, ethnology, cultural anthropology. This is not, in my opinion, the right approach. [...] The phenomenon of borderland understood in terms of peripheral space (usually in relation to the political center), in conditions of changing functions of borders, is worthy of in-depth political studies, because it is subject to dynamic transformations, also having its political dimension. [...] what should interest a political scientist is the process of "deperipheralisation" of the borderland. From a "dead" buffer zone, often maintained at the level of civilizational backwardness, borderlands are becoming a zone of intense social, economic and cultural exchange processes, often spontaneous, not initiated from above, and administratively uncontrolled integration"³⁰.

Aptly indicated by Radosław Zenderowski research perspectives of political science in the field of borderland and borderland transformation (requiring transformation of assumptions and orientation of political science research) to a large extent overlap and complement the research perspectives and transformations of intercultural pedagogy, which in a way constantly takes into account the multifaceted borderland experience and fortunately turns out - unlike political science - to be free from the „sin of omission” in relation to the problems of borderland and borderland transformation.

In the center of interest of intercultural education lie especially situations of searching, discovering, assimilating and shaping cultural identity (religious, philosophical, regional, national) in conditions - widely understood - of borders of different cultures and multiculturalism. It pays close attention to crises and metamorphoses of this identity and forms of its concretization and manifestation in contact with cultural diversity (religious, philosophical, regional, national), which occurs especially in various borderlands.

Considering the transition from multiculturalism to interculturalism, which is essential for the borderland experience, the transition from the reaction of contact with the otherness to interaction (relation of encounter) with the Other, Leszek Korporowicz - in a paradigmatic way for the transformation of intercultural pedagogy - took up the issue of "inter" in the understanding of relations occurring between different cultures:

"The perspective of interculturality better reflects and accentuates the transcultural character of mutual learning processes, the inclusion in the area of one's own cultural standards and values of the values of other groups in a way far from forcing and assimilation"³¹.

The question - which has a theoretical dimension and a practical dimension - of "how to move from a monologue to a dialogue of cultures, to mutual knowledge and understanding of each other's differences, to negotiation and caring for the common inheritance of the borderlands and for the culture of all people?"³² - as one of the basic questions of intercultural pedagogy is posed and taken up by Jerzy Nikitorowicz.

A theoretical perspective on understanding the categories of borders and borderlands was developed by Lech Witkowski:

„In the reflection on culture it seems necessary to build also a certain normative vision of the borderland, so that it is possible to decide whether we are dealing with blockages or opportunities for the effect of culturally »the life-giving borderland«”³³.

Paying attention to the dilemmas of multiculturalism, Pierpaolo Donati shows that: „Today, there is a possible way out thanks to interculturality. With this term, we generally mean a coexistence way basing on dialogue and the open debate between different cultures, which renounce both to the dominance of one on another (assimilation or colonization) and to the division without mutual communication (balkanization). One appeals to the “intercultural communication”. Certainly, the intercultural communication has a lot of credits, but also some manifest limits. Its main credit is to affirm that there is an intermediate space between the “full comprehension” within every single culture, and the “complete non-involvement” between cultures. In this way, it avoids the idea that a common world is impossible because of the dualism between the full comprehension (reachable only within a single cultural community) and the non-involvement (the complete alterity between different cultural communities), as claimed by the cultural relativists. Nonetheless, it has great difficulty – and sometimes being unable – in managing the borders between the three domains (intra-cultural, inter-cultural and multi-cultural), if not as pure communication” (Ibid, pp. 56-67).

In the pedagogical reflection on the phenomenon of borderland, Adela Koźyczkowska notices and emphasises the cognitive values of "the interpretative perspective of borderland, [...] which in Bakhtin's interpretation becomes the real center. For an educator, such a change in understanding gives rise to new questions about the educational dimension of the world of many cultures" (A. Koźyczkowska, Pogranicze jako artefakt (homogenicznego) centrum. Kontekst geopolityczny, ekonomiczno-kulturowy i symboliczny [Borderland as an artifact of the (homogenous) center. Developing the idea of „borderland universalism” based on Bakhtin's semiotic concepts, especially in relation to education, Witkowski consistently offers a theoretical perspective on the qualities of borderlands that is inspiring for pedagogical reflection:

„[...] the category of the border (and the postulate of the life-giving borderland) seems to be the foundation for thinking about man, about culture, about growing into humanity and into culture. The role of this category in the humanities increases the more artificial and violently imposed borders fall into ruin”³⁴.

Tadeusz Lewowicki points out the pedagogical value of the approach to the borderland situation (model) developed by Lech Witkowski:

“[...] in the approach proper to native intercultural education, the multicultural world is understood in a way close to the Bakhtinian (Mikhail Bakhtin's) understanding of the borderland of cultures, i.e. the contact and clash of cultures not only between different nations or ethnic groups, but also - or perhaps mainly - between people with different education, life experiences, religions, social status, etc.”³⁵.

One of the tasks of intercultural pedagogy is to develop - taking into account the current context of the dynamics of cultural transformations - a deepened understanding of the features and qualities of borderland identity, as well as the skills of intercultural communication shaped in borderlands, which at the same time contribute to the transformation of borderlands and borderland identity. The universal significance of this sphere of interest of intercultural pedagogy is indicated by Tadeusz Miczka:

“The identity of the borderland [...] and intercultural communication are [...] a test for human sensitivity and creativity, they are a projection of the needs and attitudes of people living in the borderland, but also [...] far from the borderland”³⁶.

Intercultural pedagogy undertakes, also referring to concrete historical experiences, “difficult tasks connected with shaping the need to >go to the borderland<<, bring out the tradition of pluralism of Polish culture, cultivate common cultural heritage, perceive and interpret otherness as interesting and motivating for development and cooperation”³⁷.

About the complexity, diversity, and dynamics of the borderland experience, presenting the educational opportunities and difficulties it brings, Jerzy Nikitorowicz writes insightfully:

“Living at the crossroads of cultures [at the borderlands] makes it possible to go beyond the area conditioned by settlement, because territorial location sets in motion comparative scales that act as stimuli. As a result, there can be a bivalence of emotional states towards the self and the stranger, an inability to clearly self-identify. Borderland creates opportunities by presenting offers of choice, while the culture of the borderland poses difficult tasks of shaping, preparing for choices and building together with respect and appreciation for differences”³⁸.

Viewing the borderland in this way allows for the development of interconnected concepts of borderland, identity (identity formation), transformation, and intercultural education. Aiming to develop a theoretically mature and practically useful form of intercultural pedagogy and a non-reductionist concept of "intercultural identity," Jerzy Nikitorowicz affirms the attitude of the "borderland man," open to what the diversity of cultures, religions, and languages brings, showing examples of this desirable attitude. This affirmation, however, is accompanied by a sharpened awareness that the "borderland man" should shape in himself and develop the ability to thoroughly, critically and reasonably discern the various antagonistic and conflicting tensions, which are difficult to avoid in the complex situation (dynamics of processes) of the borderland:

„[...] each borderland is characterized by specificity and can be an area of cultural integration and disintegration. On the one hand it abolishes cultural, ethnic and religious divisions, on the other it can become a space of cultural separation and stigmatization”³⁹.

The ambivalence and duality accompanying the borderland experience is well reflected in the title "Borderland as a space of axiological (un)coexistence - towards cultural exclusion", which was formulated by Ewa Ogrodzka-Mazur to present her reflections and research on the borderland also as a space of axiological choices, tensions and dilemmas⁴⁰.

Theoretical analyses and empirical studies of borderlands are accompanied by the awareness of tensions inherent in the dynamics of borderlands. In a borderland situation something can be "at the same time" what it is (which has a definite shape of identity) and "at the same time" something else, something on the borderline of one and another (or third, consecutive) being. The borderland experience seems to contain moments that are difficult to articulate unambiguously, especially in a language shaped outside the borderland (unambiguously captured in a culturally homogeneous environment with a unified image of the world and a unified system of values). In the experience of the borderland there are even apophatic moments when a meaningful silence can be a desirable attitude. Being familiar with polyphonic conditions of the borderland, one is to some extent spiritually and intellectually prepared for (reflection-stimulating) encounter with diversity and pluralism of opinions other than one's own. These other views, expressing various contents, especially concerning values, appear to a large extent as not obvious, as representing a different - what is more: difficult to understand and accept - point of view. Borderlands are not "somewhere far away", "on the borderlands", but their presence and their features, including dynamic value systems, are inscribed in various areas of human existence, shaping the understanding of basic "human issues".

It is also worth noting the far-reaching axiological convergence between the pedagogical discovery and „educational management” („educational development”) of borderlands and the ever-repeated call to go to the periphery, which Pope Francis consistently formulates in his pedagogy. The importance of the category of periphery in the teaching of Pope Francis is noted by Alfred M. Wierzbicki, among others:

"Pope Bergoglio wants the Church to find her place in the periphery. The Pope directs our attention to the existential and cultural peripheries, because they have become today the sphere of life of the majority of the Earth's inhabitants"⁴¹.

He says: one must go out to the periphery [...]. The term "periphery" did not appear unexpectedly. It was used by Jorge Bergoglio as the shepherd of his diocese. In the notes of his speech [...] during the conclave, we read that "the Church is called to go out and direct her steps to the peripheries. Not only the geographical ones, but also the existential ones: the periphery of the mystery of sin, of pain, of injustice, of ignorance; the periphery of all kinds of poverty." [...] the concept of 'peripheries' constantly accompanies the papal teaching" (K. Pawlina,

This clear and far-reaching convergence deserves a separate consideration of the similarities and differences between the approach to the borderlands in Polish intercultural pedagogy and the periphery presented in the pedagogy of Pope Francis. These are tropes and comparisons worth analyzing, which can also contribute to further transformations of intercultural pedagogy and its openness to the experience of the borderlands.

BORDERS, BORDERLANDS AND BARBARIANS. ON THE INTERPRETATION OF THE BORDER AND BORDERLANDS AS CATEGORIES SHAPING THE UNDERSTANDING AND VALUATION OF REALITY

Abolishing and overcoming of borders in various spheres of human activity seems to be one of the leading social trends in the globalizing world, especially in Western European societies in the last few decades. The borders which so far defined the forms of human activity are often perceived in the widespread concepts (ideologies) of social transformations primarily as undesirable, outmoded relics of the oppressive (also in a secret form enslaving, by means of multiple symbolic violence) past. Thanks to the intensified transformations of social practices, human liberation should take place on an unprecedented scale nowadays; thanks to this, man is becoming more and more a "man without borders", at least without those borders which are presented as a superfluous burden and a barrier to development. At the same time - as a reaction to radicalizing currents of ideas and aspirations which oppose the borders inherited from history - there seem to be more and more tendencies exposing the role of borders as a stopping barrier, including an extreme xenophobic approach which manifests increased fear of contact with strangers who cross or want to cross the borders which are set for them and treated as impassable.

The dispute about the role and value of borders as a category shaping theoretical and practical understanding of reality in its various aspects becomes a current and even "hot (heated) ideological dispute; this dispute has also its educational dimension. In this context it becomes desirable to discern also classical interpretations of the role and value of the border, an attempt to read these interpretations anew, in order not to be entangled only in contemporary one-sided and far-fetched, ideological approaches to the question of disapproval or affirmation of borders. In the classical approach to the interpretation of the role and value of the border as a category that shapes the understanding of reality, one can distinguish at least five main areas in which the question of borders is inquired into:

(1) the role and value of borders in creating and determining cognitively valuable knowledge, among others, defining as recognizing and learning borders (discovering and respecting borders vs. shaping the logical culture), borders of cognitively valuable knowledge and limitlessness of ignorance, dispute about the borders of science and rationality, as well as an approach to multiplying cognitively valuable knowledge as a constant shifting of borders and going out to the borderlands;

(2) pointing to the resistance put up by the limits in the sphere of upbringing and education as recognizing and learning the limits of reality, while the examples of the contemporary deficiency in the sphere of upbringing and education in confrontation with increased consumption are the scenes of cutting the credit cards as an element of teaching the impassable limits within the framework of the therapy for those addicted to boundless consumption which they cannot afford, as well as the "boundless barbarian" as an inverted "Pantocrator" shown in a distorting mirror; on the stage of history, the "limitless barbarian" appears as a modern "omnipotent" who does not know the role and value of borders and who is convinced that he can get away with everything, so he can do everything without any borders;

(3) another area of borders is the sphere of political activity: acting according to the principle of "divide and rule" (3) another area of borders is the sphere of political activity: divide and rule - the acquisition and consolidation of political power through borders as antagonizing dividing lines, and borders as prison walls - the enslaving and repressive functions of borders in the exercise of political power;

(4) the dispute over the absolutization of borders and the over-exposure of their value - for there are strong temptations to give to what is only relative the rank of what is absolute, which is an absolutely valid and never inviolable border;

(5) the move towards transcending limits, that is, the transcendence of human acts and the (though not always properly restrained) unveiling of the ciphers of Transcendence; there is here, among other things, the religious conviction expressed in the paradox of the mystery of the Incarnation: "The Infinite One has limits...", i.e., recognizing and learning human limits as the humbling of the divine; on a practical level, too, there is the religious indication and exhortation that "bridges, not boundary walls, should be built", i.e., the call to create community across divisive boundaries; it should be added that the understanding of Transcendence as transcending boundaries also includes laughter, humor, and irony as transcending human limits.

These five areas tend to be the focus of inquiry into the role and value of the border as a category that shapes the understanding of reality.

THE TRANSFORMATIVE POTENTIAL OF CROSS-CULTURAL INTERACTIONS

By considering intercultural communicative competence and showing that it can and should be seen as transgression, Sylwia Jaskuła and Leszek Korporowicz draw attention to the processes of transgression that occur:

„The transformational component of competence acquires particular significance in its transgressive functions, i.e. when discovering, learning and using existing cultural models requires a fundamental rebuilding and finding a different rule of perception, selection and configuration of their content, a way of interpreting and valuing them”⁴².

The formation of these transgressive communicative competences - also within the framework of intercultural education - is an appropriate response to the cultural transformation processes taking place:

"The overlapping of different cultural patterns, value systems, and the increasing mobility of cultures in a multicultural world necessitates the development of new competencies that go beyond the ability to learn the standards of the next culture we encounter in order to understand it more deeply, adapt, and avoid conflict. Hence, the shift we note in the conception and pedagogical practice of many educational and cultural institutions from the concept of multiculturalism to an intercultural perspective is neither a disregard for each of the cultures involved nor a theory of the destructive void that characterizes the hybrid area "between" conventional and established systems of values, content, and identification."⁴³"

Nowadays, one can and should consciously participate in the processes of cultural transformation and in the educational activities that regulate or support them, which allow

"to expand the imagination and sensitivity of representatives of different cultures with values discovered precisely in the processes of interaction. "Inter" means reciprocity, openness and precisely exchange, and the term "action" refers to subjectivity, agency and development with full recognition of the contents being exchanged. It does not mean mixing, blurring and, in extreme forms, accusation, betrayal of cultural values that can be considered "indigenous""⁴⁴.

This opens up prospects for cross-cultural development of individuals and communities that fosters the formation and enhancement of their subjectivity and agency.

QUESTIONS ABOUT THE LIMITS OF TRANSFORMATION (IN) INTERCULTURAL EDUCATION

To some aspects of the growing existential costs and sharpening axiological dilemmas caused by the intensifying contemporary processes of cultural transformation, especially the processes of pluralization and individualization, refers to Leszek Korporowicz:

"The decomposition of many traditional cultural patterns causes an accompanying disintegration in the area of cultural personality and a serious weakening of the directional values that form it, defining selected life goals. For cultural identity is constructed not only on the basis of the available world of meanings, but also through the world of values complementing it. [...] The principle of mutual tolerance entails the cost of a pluralistic, often disintegrated horizon of common values, which are perceived in an increasingly abstract manner, acceptable at the level of the state community. Reintegration of the field of meanings and values is an increasingly sought-after model for cultural development. The problem, however, lies in the long-standing practice of systematic destruction of the patterns of this integration imposed by modern civilization, reducing the axiological dimension of many individual and collective activities"⁴⁵.

Multiculturalism as a strongly exposed element of political ideologies, which are implemented in social and educational practice, may have equally negative effects and lead to a distorted sense of identity. Krzysztof Wielecki points it out:

"subjective, individual and collective feeling of threat, resulting from "overstimulation" of identity and personality due to the diversity of cultures, which create the socialization environment through its fluidity and multiplicity overloading the adaptive abilities of many subjects"⁴⁶.

Today there is a kind of paradoxical and unfavourable for the formation of individual subjectivity looping of multiculturalism with the unifying mass culture. Analyzing the cultural and social transformations taking place, Wielecki also draws attention to definitely undesirable phenomena in social life, which result in various forms of social exclusion:

"Multiculturalism results in cultural diversity, which, although it is not necessary, to a great extent causes serious disturbances in the cultural environment, creating a kind of multicolored, chaotic and neurotically jittery plasma of mass culture. Optimists here speak of the price to be paid for the democratization of culture, that is, equal access to the same content, regardless of social status. I would argue, however, that the kind of culture that exists today is one of the most significant factors in social exclusion. Narrow elites of education will protect their cultural distinctiveness anyway. But along with some beneficial effects, the fruits of mass culture are overwhelmingly poisonous."⁴⁷"

The European Union has got a great potential to influence the outcomes of the globalisation game. However, it is not going to perform this function successfully, unless it properly understands what is it really about. Accordingly, it is a dramatic necessity to launch a comprehensive debate about the change in terms of civilisation we are experiencing in our days and about an outline of the future world that gradually appears from the chaos of change. This is an obligation of intellectuals, of the whole intelligent class, of all people educated enough to participate. In the conclusion of his investigations, Wielecki vividly shows the ambivalence of the current situation, in which it is difficult to reach an unambiguous conclusion⁴⁸. This is a challenge that intercultural pedagogy has to face as well, especially going out to the borderlands.

IN CONCLUSION: A NEW OPENING FOR BORDERLANDS

In the pedagogical reflection on borderlands as a special kind of space of intercultural relations, an increasingly analytically in-depth consideration of the issues is needed. It turns out that these issues are increasingly complex and intellectually demanding⁴⁹. That is why it is necessary to trace again and carefully our own - long-lasting and multifaceted - intensive peregrinations of intercultural pedagogy in borderlands. One should remember that it is a peculiarly invasive peregrination. It leaves a more or less distinct trace in borderlands, co-shaping the ways of experiencing borderlands and co-shaping borderland identities.

In this situation, there is a postulate to properly edit an anthology of articles that give evidence about the course and the effects of pedagogical recognition of the borderland, which takes place in an interdisciplinary dialogue⁵⁰. This anthology should include - which sounds quite obvious - those statements which have become classic and canonical in the field of intercultural pedagogy, because they are often quoted as one of the basic - as if inalienable - points of reference. It is worth trying to read them anew in order to give them a new power of ⁴⁸ "Multiculturalism contributes to the questioning of fundamental values. Particularly through secularization, it takes away traditional ways of rooting one's life and identity more deeply. The disintegration of horizons of reference and anomie give man great opportunities to determine himself, but, on the other hand, he feels a very strong deprivation of basic psychological needs such as security, acceptance, identity, meaning and significance. Such a situation triggers neurotic defensive reactions of the psyche, including obviously pathological ones. On the other hand, today, when we live in a postmodern world of cultural multiplicity, in which the effects of indeterminacy, fluidity, ambiguity, lack of clear values, beliefs and customs are already clearly visible, we see that freedom and diversity are beautiful values, but not the most important ones. It is worth noting, however, that all these values, only in a certain axiological pattern, together with responsibility and subjectivity, become something truly valuable, and without this they can be downright dangerous" (K. Wielecki, Miedzy różnorodnością kulturową i rozpadem tożsamości [Between cultural diversity and identity disintegration], „Uniwersyteckie Czasopismo Socjologiczne” 2014, No 9, pp. 48-49). See: E. influence. The texts gathered in the anthology should be accompanied by discussions and thorough comments, so that better understanding of the borderland and intercultural relations could be created, so that intercultural pedagogy could become theoretically more mature and self-conscious about its own scientific identity, and intercultural education could become even more effective and at the same time more reflective pedagogical activity.
